The first part of the paper is devoted to a discussion of the various methods which have been proposed for the determination of the rate of reaction between a radical and a molecule. The most common of these is the method of initial rates, in which the initial concentration of the radical is varied and the initial rate of reaction is measured. This method is simple and direct, but it is subject to a number of errors, and it is often difficult to obtain accurate results. Another method which has been proposed is the method of half-lives, in which the half-life of the radical is measured. This method is also simple, but it is subject to similar errors to the method of initial rates. A third method which has been proposed is the method of steady-state concentrations, in which the concentration of the radical is maintained at a constant value and the rate of reaction is measured. This method is more complicated, but it is more accurate than the other two methods.

In this paper, the method of initial rates has been used to determine the rate of reaction between a radical and a molecule.
 The results show that the rate of reaction is proportional to the concentration of the radical, and that it is independent of the concentration of the molecule. This is in agreement with the theory of the reaction, which predicts that the rate of reaction should be proportional to the concentration of the radical, and independent of the concentration of the molecule.

The results also show that the rate of reaction is proportional to the square root of the concentration of the radical. This is in agreement with the theory of the reaction, which predicts that the rate of reaction should be proportional to the square root of the concentration of the radical.
